The Connelly house is located on the west side of Layhill Road (Maryland Route 182), north of its intersection with Georgia Avenue (Maryland Route 97). It is set on a slight rise in a small yard, and is surrounded by several large trees.

The main block of the house is 2½ stories high, 3 bays wide and 1 bay deep, aligned parallel to Layhill Road. It is gable roofed with a center cross gable and a brick end chimney on the south end. A two-story gable roofed ell is located on the west side of the house.

The principal (east) facade contains three 2/2 windows on its second story, and one similar window in the cross gable. A one-story Colonial Revival porch extends along this facade, sheltering a central doorway flanked by two 2/2 windows. A similar small porch is located on the north end of the house.

The house is probably the Catherine Connelly house shown at approximately this location on both the 1878 and the 1894 Hopkins atlases.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

This house form is typical of late 19th century Maryland houses, and is one of only a few such examples remaining in the Layhill area. It is rare in its immediate neighborhood, an area which is characterized by dense suburban development and which has few older structures.
